Notes from Bioregional Congress, Mexico excerpted from a posted letter by Starhawk

January 2, 1997

In November I spent two weeks in Mexico, first at the Bioregional Congress which was held in Tepoztlan, about an hour away from Mexico City. A year ago, the people of Tepoztlan began protesting the government's support of a plan for a corporation to build a golf course on land that was supposed to be protected. Essentially, they staged an ecological uprising, somehow succeeded in throwing the government out, barricading their streets and declaring themselves a nongovernmental zone. We were privileged to meet some of the local activists as well as many local herbalists and healers. The latter was important for me as I had the Nasty Flu through the whole Congress and had such bad laryngitis that I was forced to learn many annoying spiritual lessons about the virtues of silence.

For me, the highlight of the week was being asked to lead a spiral dance on the last night of the Congress, when I had fortunately recovered some of my voice. The moon was full, and we began with a pipe ceremony led by indigenous people of tribes from Venezuela to northern Canada. Then we spiraled with about four hundred people, chanting, "She changes everything she touches, and everything she touches, changes" -- in Spanish: "Ella cambia todo lo que toca, y todo lo que toca cambia." We also chanted the slogan of the Tepoztlan uprising: "Si, se puede," which means both "yes, we can", and "yes, it's possible." In the spiral, you pass every person in the ritual and can look into each other's eyes. To see such a diversity of faces pass by, of all the shapes and colors and ages that make up this continent, to feel linked in a common purpose and emotion across the vast diversity of our backgrounds and experience, was one of the most profoundly moving moments of my life.

Copyright (c) 1997 by Starhawk. All rights reserved. This copyright protects Starhawk's right to future publication of her work. Nonprofit, activist, and educational groups may circulate this essay (forward it, reprint it, translate it, post it, or reproduce it) for nonprofit uses. Please do not change any part of it without permission. Readers are invited to visit the web site: www.starhawk.org.

 NOTICE: In accordance with Title 17 U.S.C. Section 107, this material is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving the included information for research and educational purposes.